THE MUSIC

IN THE

TEMPEST;

COMPOSED BY

Mr. HENRY PURCELL.

THE TEMPEST is one of the earlieſt and beſt of PURCELL's Compoſitions for the Stage: It has been often performed, and the Public are ſo well acquainted with its Merits, that any Thing, which the Editor could attempt to ſay in favour of them, muſt appear ſuperfluous.

The Words differ in many Places from DRYDEN's Play; in the Maſk, almoſt entirely: It is ſuppoſed, that they were altered when the Play was made into an Opera by SHADWELL, and that PURCELL was then employed to compoſe new Muſic for them: The former Muſic for the Play was probably compoſed by MATTHEW LOCK, and the Inſtrumental Part of it which he publiſhed in 1695, retained in the Opera.

The Song, "Dear, pretty Youth," has ſometimes a trifling and rather ludicrous Effect; which may be occaſioned in a great Meaſure, by accelerating the Time too much in the latter Part. The Air is in itſelf an elegant one; and it might be worth while to try, whether a better Effect would not be produced, by ſinging the whole in a ſlow and ſomewhat pathetic Manner, as if DORINDA were under the Influence of ſome Fear and Concern, in Conſequence of what PROSPERO had ſaid to her: Though, it muſt be owned, that this does not ſeem to accord exactly with the Author's Deſign. It may be worth remarking, that this Song is not in the printed Copies of DRYDEN's Play.

In the Execution of this Work, the Performer's Convenience has been conſulted in reſpect to the Poſition of the Notes, and turning over the Leaves. The Figuring of the thorough Baſs, was attended with much Difficulty; but therein, the Editor was favoured with the Aſſiſtance of one of the moſt intelligent Maſters, that do Honour to the Profeſſion of Muſic; to whom, and the other Gentlemen who have befriended him on this Occaſion, with their Subſcriptions or otherwiſe, he takes this Opportunity of acknowledging his Obligations.
